1. Winter maneuvers of Soviet troops in the Doellersheim training area are to begin in early March 1951. Eight divisions, each consisting of 12,000 men, are allegedly to take part. These divisions will not be up to wartime strength. For the most part, troops already stationed in Austria will participate in these maneuvers. [redacted] no tanks are now stationed at Doellersheim. An armored division allegedly moved to St. Poelten at the beginning of the winter. Six general staff officers are now in Doellersheim. Two of these are often seen in mufti. The Soviet artillery division at Allensteig has 565 officers, including three generals.
2. According to an Allensteig [redacted] no troop transports have arrived there to date. Allensteig headquarters has ordered all Soviet women except those performing essential duties to leave for the USSR by 25 March 1951. Austrian female employees are afraid that they will probably be discharged and replaced by Soviet wives who are unwilling to leave their husbands. A number of Soviet women have already been ordered back to the USSR to be drafted into the army.
3. The Russians maintain a "school" at Doellersheim where Austrian female employees can voluntarily study Russian and engage in political discussions. The following propaganda is emphasized: War is inevitable. The Americans will start a war, be defeated by the Soviets and be driven out of Europe. Austria will be overrun. The Soviets will do their own fighting. The Austrians will not be recruited for the army but will have to work, even in the USSR, but later will be allowed to return to Austria.

It was observed on 17 January 1951 that the Soviet traffic control point at Tienna 25, Inzersdorf, which was long unoccupied, has again been occupied by Soviet troops.

Between 15 and 20 January 1951 in various localities in Wagram near the Tulln airbase, Soviet soldiers and officers were seen taking measurements with instruments resembling surveying apparatus.

[redacted] this equipment is well known as "E-equipment" (E-Geräte). This activity was observed in fields near the foregoing localities in the
